Theme of SEMINAR

Commercializing academic research is a much discussed topic, both by academicians and the business community. Process of translating basic scientific discoveries to clinical applications is the most important but challenging objective in biomedical research. Translational research is a concept that has been emerged to fill the gap between researchers and clinical practice. The process of applying ideas, insights and discoveries generated through basic scientific inquiry to the treatment or prevention of human disease is referred as translational research. Significant shortcomings are observed in the delivery of effective products through the basic scientific research despite of all the work and funding placed towards the translating basic research into effective clinical practice. This national seminar will not only highlight the importance of translational research but also put forward the ways and means of doing the translational research. This seminar will certainly help to bring the bench research to the bed side of the patient.

Adoption of translational research model in academia has great long-term benefits including enhanced understanding and driving their research towards the translational activities within a conceptual framework. More simulation can be achieved between the basic research and commercial development of drug(s) and or drug products. This seminar may increase the advancement of knowledge by refining discussions of translation and allowing more precise identification of barriers to progress.
